Does Michael L. Brown indicate that he would not acknowledge the inspiration of the New Testament if it denied the essential truth that the Jews are still God's chosen people with a yet to be fulfilled eschatological destiny.

Based on my research, I have found the key statement and context. Let me compile the answer now.

Michael L. Brown's Position on New Testament Inspiration and Israel's Eschatological Destiny

Yes, Michael L. Brown has made a statement that strongly suggests he would question the authority of the New Testament if it denied Israel's future national restoration. During his June 2014 debate with Don Preston on Romans 11:25-27, Brown made a revealing statement about his hermeneutical approach to this issue.

The Key Statement

When Don Preston asked Brown on what basis one could reject instances where New Testament writers spiritually apply Old Testament promises that appear to require literal or physical fulfillments, Brown responded:

> "If a later interpretation undermines an earlier prophecy, it has to be discounted."

He further stated:

> "If the New Testament writers made void the words of the Old Testament prophets, then it's the New Testament writers who have to be rightly questioned." [1]

Brown qualified this by adding: "Consistent interpretation says they made nothing void. They just gave further insight into the meaning of the prophets." [1]

Understanding Brown's Position

This statement reveals a significant presuppositional commitment in Brown's theology. He effectively establishes a hermeneutical criterion whereby the Old Testament prophecies concerning Israel's national and physical restoration serve as a test for valid New Testament interpretation. If the New Testament were to spiritualize or transform these promises in ways that Brown considers to "void" them, he indicates he would question the New Testament writers rather than accept their interpretation. [1]

Brown's position reflects his broader theological stance against what he calls "replacement theology" or "supersessionism." He has consistently argued that God's promises to ethnic Israel remain valid and that:

- The Jewish people remain God's chosen people elected for service, even while many are "enemies of the gospel" [2] [3]
- God's gifts and calling to the Jewish people are irrevocable (Romans 11:28-29) [3] [4]
- Physical scatterings require corresponding physical regatherings—Brown rejects interpretations where "Part A is literal and then the promise that corresponds to it... is spiritual" [5]
- If the New Testament "fundamentally changed the meaning of what came before, then it must be rejected" [6]

Implications

This hermeneutical stance essentially places Brown's understanding of Old Testament prophecy as a filter through which the New Testament must be interpreted. His conviction that the Jewish people retain a special eschatological destiny as a nation—including future national restoration and turning to Messiah—functions as a non-negotiable theological commitment that conditions how he reads the entire New Testament. [4] [7] [2]

Critics of Brown's position, such as Gary DeMar, have argued that Brown's hermeneutic creates problems when the New Testament writers themselves spiritually apply Old Testament prophecies in unexpected ways. However, Brown maintains that proper interpretation shows the New Testament writers provided "further insight" rather than voiding the original promises to Israel. [8] [1]
